Thanks. That is what several people were guessing. The Alumni Assn sent some info on it Sunday night.

It is our "once in always in policy" – essentially once a source is a major source, then they are always a major source even if at a later date they become an area source (the status is dependent on the amount of hazardous air pollutants they emit).

It was important for us, because by complying with the rules, which were very stringent, the source might reduce their emissions below major source thresholds. Without OIAI, we would lose them as a regulated source – the act of compliance would reduce their emissions to area source status and then we would lose the stringent compliance monitoring the major source rule required.

Thanks. Best wishes with that. I am not even sure, from what this Dow Jones report says, what they are referring to. I will look on other news outlets that perhaps may report more completely.

Yes, I heard about it. I'm going to try to get someone from OGC or OAR to tell us what it means for us. But I am afraid that I know.

FYI, see first item linked below. I hadn't heard about anything happening, so this is a surprise. These news items are very brief, so not enough info to really understand what they are talking about.
